SAN FRANCISCO CHRONICLE AND SFGATE.COM | Sunday, October 31, 2010 | Section L

Five Places: Doesn't have to be Halloween — these places will give you a fright year-round L2

Go Now: Even in the heart of the Napa Valley, wine-free diversions abound in pastoral St. Helena L6

Remote Makgadikgadi Pans surreal landscape, endless sky

ECIAL TO THE CHRONICLE

By Mark Sissons

what they tell you. Yet here I am, lying flat on my back on the ground, hundreds of yards from the safety of the Range Rover, in the middle of Botswana's Kalahari Desert, world renowned for its big-game viewing. And instead of nervously wondering where the lions and leopards are, I'm feeling downright peaceful under a brilliant canopy of stars in a place so enormous, empty and silent that I can actually hear the blood circulating in my head. If this were one of Botswana's other jewels — the Okavango Whatever you do, don't get out of the truck. At least that's Delta, the world's largest inland delta; Moremi Game Reserve; or Chobe National Park, each teeming with four-legged preda-- I'd probably be the main course by now. But here, in a remote part of the Kalahari called the Makgadikgadi Pans, I'm OK to go walkabout because you can spot uninvited dinner guests a coun-try mile away in this remnant of what was once the world's largest lake. Covering 23,000 square miles of what is now northern Botswana, Lake Makgadikgadi dried up less than 10,000 years ago, leaving a flat, starkly beauti-ful salt bed of ethereal, glittering white moonscapes from horizon to horizon, along with super-size skies and exceptional visibility. This is Death Valley meets "Wild Kingdom" — and one of Africa's most unusual safari destinations.

Camp, a permanent 1940s-style tented safari camp.

which are usually all about ticking Big Five sightings off your bucket list, the landscape is the big draw in this unique ecosys tem, thought to be the world's largest salt pan. Eerie, other-worldly, surreal — all have been used to describe the Makgadik-When I first came out here, it

Unlike most African safaris

"When I first came out here, it completely blew my mind and changed everything," says Super Sande, who's been guiding in the Makgadikgadi for more than 20 years. "I'd planned to stay only two weeks. But once I was out here amid this incredible sense of space, I felt I was finally able to

You could wander for weeks in the Makgadikgadi without en-countering another human being, let alone the swarms of safari vehicles that make some of Africa's game parks seem like vehic-ular feeding frenzies. "I can park my truck any-where here and look at 10,000 animals in front of me for the animais in front of the for the whole day or even a week with-out seeing anybody," says Sande. Huge herds of wildebeests, springboks and one of Africa's last great zebra migrations turn the Makgadikgadi into a movable feast for predators such as lions,

Botswana continues on L5

Above: The Makgadikgadi Pans is the site of southern Africa's last surviving zebra and wildebeest migration. Top: Sunset ignites the African skies above the shores of the Makgadikgadi

Starkly beautiful landscape's quiet call

Botswana from page L1 cheetahs, jackals and the rare brown hyena when the spring rains come, transforming this harsh wasteland into a lush green carpet of savanna grass. Shallow lakes also form then, providing nesting grounds for Africa's second-largest gathering of pink flamingoes.

Some of those lakes turn out to be mirages, glittering in the hazy margins of this epic emptiness as clouds of gray clay dust streak across a cobalt sky in the wake of our sprinting Land Cruiser. Overhead, giant cumulus clouds hover in formations like whimsically shaped airships. With no permanent roads and constantly shifting tracks, navigating Botswana's Empty Quarter without a GPS can be risky. "If you get lost out here, you either have to just give up or hope for the best," Sande says. Post office tree Unless you happen to spot the only real landmark for hundreds of miles around. Chapman's Baobab (also ### known as the Seven Sisters) is one of Africa's largest trees, with a circumference of more than 80 feet. By some estimates nearly 3,000 years old, this solitary goliath is named for James Chapman, a South African trader and explorer who camped beneath its six massive trunks during an expedition in 1861. This famous navigational beacon was often used as a post office by early explorers such as David Livingstone and Frederick Selous, who would leave mes-sages for each other in it. As Kalahari scrub robins and swallow-tailed bee-eaters perch on branches high above, Sande points to a hole 10 feet up the main trunk large enough to hold a duffel bag. "That's where the early European explorers and travelers used to leave letters for each other," he says, adding that correspondence would some times take up to a year to recipient early visitors carved dated inscriptions in the baobab's gnarled trunk going back to style collection of 10 canvas tents spread across an island of desert palms and Kalahari acacia — is a couple of hours acacia — is a couple as the vulture flies. Built by the son of a white hunter named Jack Bousfield, outdoor showers. Persian

Driving from Chapman's Baobab back to our base — a traditional East African 1940s-who first settled in the Mak-gadikgadi Salt Pans in the 1960s, Jack's Camp is an up-scale throwback to the classical safari era of Hemingway. Each of its spacious tents has a large veranda, en suite bathroom, and rustic indoor and

A small group of Zu/'hoasi Bushmen guides camp guests on morning walks and game drives in the area. property developer Karl Homrugs, antiques and period cocktails around the fire pit. ambience. A shaded lap pool overlook-He is here with his wife and ing the pans catches the Kalatwo teenage children. "The hari breeze while offering welcome respite from the intense midday heat. Guests gather around the central dining tent's communal table for gourmet meals and tales told by the camp's veter an staff, many of whom are graduate students who combine research with guiding. Only limited solar-powered electricity is available during the daytime; the yellow glow of kerosene lamps and the flicker of firelight illuminate the inky African night. "Jack's Camp is quite different from the camps I saw in other places. There's more solitude here," retired German Makgadikgadi is a place where you can really let your soul dangle.' A passionate amateur anthropologist, Bousfield, who died in a 1992 plane crash, put his own heart and soul into scouring this magnificent desolation for fossils, prehistoric Bushmen tools and bones hauling back everything from elephant femurs to baboon skulls.

Bousfield's eclectic collection is on display in the dining tent, alongside a series of stun-ning black-and-white portraits taken by his son and current camp co-owner, Ralph. Many depict the camp's resident gles, snakes and jackals forage for lizards, insects and other small prey, sentries stand ramrod straight, on constant alert for hungry ea Jack's Camp employs a "meerkat man" whose sole job is to spend quality time ever day with the meerkats, gradually habituating them to limited human contact. Which explains why the meerkats' preferred watchtowers are often visitor's heads, which provide them with excellent vantage points. As I sit stone still near the entrance to the meerkats' manor, several eventually emerge, cautiously investigate me and

ZIMBARWE

Jack's Camp (www.unchartedafrica.com) is a luxury permanent tented camp designed in a traditional East African 1940s safari style.

WHERE TO STAY

Those on a more modest budget can opt for nearby Camp Kalahari. owned and operated by the same company. Africa Adventure Consultants (www.adventuresinafrica.com, (866) 778-1089) of Denver offers a range of customizable luxury, adventure and family-oriented Botswana safaris that include Makgadikgadi Pans and Nxai Pan national Parks, Chobe National Park, the Okavango Delta, Moremi Game Reserve and the central Kalahari.

South African Airways (www.flysaa.com) has daily nonstop flights to Johannesburg from New York and Washington, with frequent connections to Maun in Botswana. Light aircraft transfer guests from Maun to Jack's Camp.

Zu/'hoasi Bushmen, employed then scamper one by one up onto my legs and into my lap like miniature mountaineers. to offer guests guided nature walks, where the Kalahari's original inhabitants demon-strate age-old survival tech-niques — from finding water One brave climber eventually clambers up my neck and onto my head, where it assumes the signature meerkat position.

scorpion. Audience participation is optional. A visit to the meerkats Mandatory, however, is a visit to a meerkat burrow not far from camp. These industri-ous members of the mongoose family live in close-knit family expected to pitch in. While in a desert and starting a fire with twigs to sucking the life-sustaining juices out of a live some furiously dig out the entrances to their homes or shadow puppets. Several hundred paces on, sprawled on the soft, warm clay ground, I gaze up at the same southern celestial con-stellations our distant ances tors once saw as they huddled on the shores of this imponderably vast inland sea. Waves of silence and serenity now flow through the magical Mak-gadikgadi. With a current soothing enough to make you want to get out of the truck and take a long, slow stroll

Letting a wild animal, no matter how cuddly and cute, use the top of your head as a lookout can drive a person to drink. Sundowners, to be precise, served by the campfire on a ghostly white pan that extends in all directions like a frozen infinity pool. Gin and tonic in hand, I venture toward the crimson African distant horizon like furtive setting sun as silhouettes of a into the middle of nowhere Just to hear yourself think. Freelance writer Mark Sissons last wrote for Travel on South Africa. E-mail comments to travel@sfcbronicle.com.